

Your Answers — Thames & Tiger Introductory Call

Ready-to-use responses for Pavan Kumar G S · 15-minute call with Tejaswini Chandra, HR Manager

These are written the way you'd actually say them out loud — read them over a couple of times so they sound natural and not memorized, and adjust any phrase that doesn't sound like you.

Q1. Tell me about yourself.

I'm a Computer Science engineering student from Ghousia College of Engineering, and alongside my degree I've built and published two Android apps on the Play Store, and developed a few full-stack projects, including a production web platform I deployed and managed on my own server. Outside of tech, I've also helped manage a DTF printing shop that my brother owns, where I dealt with customers directly, took their orders, and made sure everything was delivered on time. That mix of hands-on building and direct customer handling is really what's brought me here — I'm a quick learner, and I'm looking for an opportunity where I can grow professionally and pick up new skills beyond just the technical side.

Tip: Keep this to about a minute. Let it flow naturally rather than reciting it word for word.

Q2. This role is quite different from your technical background — why are you interested?

My core strength is building things end-to-end, but through the shop I realized I genuinely enjoy the customer-facing side too — understanding what someone needs, explaining things clearly, and making sure they walk away satisfied. I'm early in my career, so I'd rather explore a role like this now, where I can grow professionally and build business and leadership skills, than assume a desk job is my only path.

Tip: Being honest here lands better than overselling — this answer is honest and still positive.

Q3. Are you comfortable with a target-driven, field-based role rather than sitting at a desk?

Yes. Running the shop meant dealing with walk-in customers every day — handling their questions, sometimes their complaints, and making sure orders were completed on time even when things got busy. So I'm used to being on my feet, talking to people directly, and being accountable for results rather than just working behind a screen.

Q4. How do you handle rejection or a customer saying no?

At the shop, not every customer was happy right away — sometimes a print didn't come out the way they expected, or they wanted a better price, and I had to stay calm, hear them out, and find a solution instead of taking it personally. It's a similar mindset to when an app I've built doesn't work as expected — I treat it as something to fix, not a reason to give up.

Q5. Where do you see yourself in 2-3 years?

I'd like to grow into a role where I'm leading people and outcomes, not just handling tasks — building on the responsibility and time management I picked up from running the shop, while staying open to whatever the business needs from me along the way. I'm not fixed on one exact title, I just want to keep growing and developing new skills.

Q6. What are your salary expectations?

Before I give a number, I'd like to understand the split between the fixed and commission part of the pay. My expectation would be based mainly on the guaranteed component — once I know that clearly, I'm happy to share what I'm looking for.

Tip: This isn't dodging the question — it's a fair, professional way to answer before you have full information. See Section 4 of the main prep guide for the follow-up question to ask.

Q7. Are you open to relocating within Bangalore, or travelling across the city daily?

Yes, I'm based in Bengaluru already, so travelling across the city for work isn't a problem for me.

Tip: Adjust this if your actual commute situation is different — keep it truthful.

Pairs with your Thames & Tiger Interview Prep guide, which covers the company background and the questions worth asking them in return.